Secretary Jewell, Assistant Secretary Kia'aina to Host Panel Discussion on Climate Change Impacts to Pacific Island Nations in Free Association with the United States

WASHINGTON, D.C. – U.S. Secretary of the Interior Sally Jewell will offer opening remarks tomorrow at a panel discussion on climate change impacts facing three Pacific island nations freely associated with the United States. Assistant Secretary for Insular Areas Esther Kia'aina and Interior's Office of Insular Affairs are hosting the dialogue.

The panel discussion will include remarks from the Ambassadors of the Freely Associated States which include the Republic of the Marshall Islands, the Federated States of Micronesia and the Republic of Palau. These Pacific island nations have had close historical ties with the United States dating back to World War II and their current relationships with the U.S. are enshrined in Compacts of Free Association.

“There's no doubt that these Pacific islands are on the front lines of climate change,” said Secretary Jewell. “This forum is designed to help build public awareness and strengthen the partnerships needed to support these nations as they work to adapt and build resilience against the impacts of climate change.”

“Climate change is a global issue, and nowhere is it more apparent than in the Freely Associated States,” said Assistant Secretary Kia'aina. “This panel gives the Ambassadors of these Pacific nations a platform to describe the impacts their islands are already experiencing and discuss ways and means to work collaboratively with the United States to help prepare for and adapt to these changes.

The forum will be held on Thursday, December 11, 2014 at 1:15 p.m. ET in the South Interior Building Auditorium. News media representatives and other interested parties are welcome to attend. Interviews with the participants may be facilitated.
